The Unveiling of the Monument.
A correspondent of the Wilmington, Del., News, writing of the unveiling of the Confederate monument in this city, says: "I went over to Alexandria the other day to see for myself what happened at the unveiling of the Confederate monument. There is a relic of a hundred years ago. The town is small in area laid out in squares like a real city, and has the quaintest old brick buildings imaginable. The grass grows among the cobble stone pavements. The sewerage appears to flow in the gutters. The day of the unveiling of the Confederate monument was the 28th anniversary of that tragedy of the early war times which thrilled the North. The day too was the anniversary of the departure of 600 picked men of Alexandria to join the army of Virginia at Manassas. Upon the very spot where they assembled the base of the monument stands to day. It is the first Confederate monument to be erected in what may be called a Northern town, for although Alexandria is essentially Southern, its territory was once a part of the District of Columbia, and during the whole war almost Federal ground.

Thousands of people crowded in on the celebration day. Hardly a building on the main thoroughfare was there that did not display the red white and blue, and the hospitable Virginians kept open house everywhere. Three or four camps of Confederate veterans paraded, and three Confederate flags could be discovered. One was displayed from a building on King street, and two bearing marks of battle were carried by the Southern soldiers. The badges of the veterans also bore the stars and bars. Governor Fitzhugh Lee spoke moderately—Capt.
Daniel was a little raw.
A Union veteran with a Grand Army badge in his button hole stood at the corner of Fairfax and King streets to see the procession pass. His right sleeve was empty.
As the Confederate veterans approached he took off his disheveled cap, swung it in the air and began to cheer. As soon as the paraders got sight of him they set up the familiar piercing rebel yell, and the demonstration was kept up until the whole line of Confederates had passed by. Many times, indeed, the more enthusiastic Southerners left the ranks to grab the Yankee soldiers by the hand. There were many greetings of a similar kind at the monument. One ex-Confederate whom I saw grasped a Grand Army man by the hand and said that he royally welcome there. I noticed two members of the Loyal Legion who seemed to be treated with plenty of deference wherever they went.

One drunken young fellow in the crowd said: "If I had been old enough I would have worn the gray and killed at the Yankee women in Fairfax county." But a neighbor retorted: "It was not a war against woman." "Yes," said the other, "but they threw pepper in our eyes." Then his legs got badly tangled and they carried him away. It was so with a war-scarred veteran who had to be taken out of the crowd. Generally the people cheered such names as Jefferson Davis and applauded the boldest sentiments of the speakers most, but it was a great, good-natured holiday for Alexandria and the sentiment occasioned was sympathetic if not pitiful, rather than boisterous and unforgiving.

The speech of Captain Daniel, who presented the monument on behalf of the artists, was three-quarters of an hour long. It was evidently the opportunity of his lifetime and he proposed to make the most of it.
Governor Lee, stout, big-voiced and rosy, was moderate enough. Perhaps it was because he realized that his effort would have a national reading. Generally he spoke of the beauties of peace.

The monument is of heroic size, representative of a man in the prime of life, looking a little down, as if with hope for the future.
There is a granite pedestal to it, but it stands in the middle of the pavement at the intersection of two streets without a bit of green. The daughter of old General Corse of the Seventeenth Virginia pulled the string when the proper time came. She is a sweet-faced blonde girl of perhaps 20, and undoubtedly always will recollect with pride the fact that she can be referred to as the young lady who unveiled the Alexandria soldiers' monument.
